Not familiar with this topic. I am marking it as highest priority because the issue should be looked at expeditiously by ISMS. One of the parts of the mission of ISMS is to protect public health and, if due diligence by ISMS shows that the info given in this resolution is accurate, ISMS should act on it with the goal of protecting public health.

Again yeah. A medical issue that we should be involved with. Not social and political issues. Not our areas

Doubt people know the definition and don't understand even when fold

Agree

This is an invasive procedure that carries significant risk and no benefit to health. The clients are misled, confused or deluded into thinking that clearing out the colon is akin to a form of deep "house cleaning". They become convinced by alternative pseudo-medical sales people that this procedure will be safe and effective for something--maybe anything and everything. The victims of this procedure may have multiple known and unknown medical issues and seek out or are talked into subjecting themselves to a procedure that may make them extraordinarily sick or even kill them. The appearance of the office will give the impression that there are skilled medical personnel involved which is part of the ruse. This procedure has virtually no oversight and no scientific based authority that recommends standards. It's all snake oil and flimflam but unfortunately clients go for the marketing and the superficial unsupportable explanations.

Go for it. But only if you are also going after the chiropractors, podiatrists, optometrists, and other pretenders committing malpractice every day. While you're at it, how about gaining control over the PAs (and NPs, if we're being honest).

Finally a medical issue. Pat yourself on the back.

We have to stand up to the quacks

Resolved are contradictory to each other.

I guess at one time all mental patients were enemas to enemas and many illnesses were either treated by blood letting or enemas. However advances in medicine proved them useless and harmful but the lure of detoxification among the lay public is so great that they will do anything to detox! I think these practices should be banned and barred. They poses another issue of spread of the illnesses.

Voodoo medicine has no place in modern society

Because of that I don't even think we should have a position. ISMS should not be involved in any way -- unless the State comes to us and ASKS for an opinion. I give this low priority. No reason we need to get in a discussion with anyone about this. I just think we need to guard our resources and pick and choose very carefully.
